10. STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE
Jarrah Tree, Armadale, a site containing an exceptionally large jarrah tree, has cultural heritage significance for the following reasons:
  - surviving trees of equivalent age and girth are rare in the metropolitan area;
  - the tree reflects the great age of this species and is an important remnant of the period prior to European colonisation;

the tree has landmark quality and illustrates the girth of some jarrah forest trees before European settlement and subsequent clearing and timber felling; the place contributes to the community's sense of place by providing a physical link with the history of the development of Armadale;

the place was associated with Thomas Saw, one of the earliest settlers in the district, a major property owner and local benefactor , who sold the land on which the tree stands to the Minister for Education to be used as a school site;

the tree was associated with playground activities at Armadale Primary School from 1904 to 1987 and is highly valued by the local community;

the tree was the subject of a Conservation Order issued on 14 November 1997 after the Minister for Heritage had received 1,147 submissions in favour of conservation; and, the tree forms an integral part of the Bicentennial Heritage Tree Trail and is included on the Register of Significant Trees of the National Trust of Australia (WA).
