10. STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE
Scots Presbyterian Church, a Federation Gothic style limestone, brick and terra cotta shingle pattern tiled church building, has cultural heritage significance for the following reasons:
  - the place has landmark quality standing as the dominant structure on the corner of South Terrace and Parry Street;
  - the place has important aesthetic qualities imparted by the colour and textures of the contrasting ashlar limestone walls and mellow red brick quoins, the soaring verticality of its form and the loftiness and pleasant textures of the timber roof construction pitted against the smooth walls of the interior space;

the place is the first Presbyterian Church in Fremantle;

the place is associated with members of the Presbyterian Church in Fremantle from the 1890s to the present and has particular social value to those members of the church who opposed amalgamation with the Uniting Church; and, the place was designed by J.J. Talbot Hobbs, a prominent Perth architect and community member of the time.

On the north-west side, between the hall and the adjacent stone wall of the Fremantle Markets a modern meeting room, kitchen and toilets have been built. The modern meeting room has no heritage value and is not significant.
