Enderslea, comprising a Victorian Georgian homestead, barn, food shelter, sheds, sheep dip, well, and windmill on a rural property, has cultural heritage significance for the following reasons:
  - the place, in particular the homestead and barn, has close associations with the early development of the region;
  - the Victorian Georgian homestead and large prominent stone barn have high aesthetic value;
  - the place is valued by the community for its close associations with the Morley family and for its use as a social centre during the latter half of the nineteenth century; and, the property was the site of the first grape vines grown in the district.

The sheds and windmill are an integral part of the complex and contribute to the understanding of the place.
